

QUICK ACTION IN THE BEST INTEREST OF THE CHILDREN

In January, the police took action against a baby trafficking syndicate in Penang where babies were sold to couples. While we fully support police action in stopping trafficking, we are extremely concerned with the way the 9 children “rescued” by the police have been handled.

According to reports, these children, ranging from 2 months to 8 years, were removed abruptly from the care of their adoptive parents by the police in the middle of the night. Some of these children were very traumatised at the sudden separation, were crying non-stop, and some were sickly. They were subsequently sent to a shelter home.

It has been over ONE month since these children have been separated from their adoptive parents. Up to today, attempts to contact the welfare officers and the police for information about these children including their whereabouts have been met with silence, as this case is deemed a “police case” and investigations are on-going.

While we respect the criminal justice process, it is equally important to recognise that Malaysia is a signatory to the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child 1989 and its principles as incorporated in the Child Act 2001. Therefore the best interest of the child must be paramount in all cases that involve children. The emotional and physical well-being of these children cannot be made secondary to police investigations.

While the buying and selling of babies or children cannot be condoned, these innocent children are facing the brunt of the implementation of the law. The sudden and on-going separation from their adoptive parents can cause trauma and distress which may lead to emotional damage which may be permanent. Government agencies must be more caring and sensitive in their handling of children. Children need proper care and protection and cannot be treated as objects.

It is therefore imperative that the Social Welfare Department and the Child Protection Team implement the Fit and Proper Persons Regulations 2009 under the Child Act 2001. It is necessary to urgently assess whether the adoptive parents can be fit caregivers for these children. If so, the children should be returned to the adoptive parents to provide a caring environment while the criminal investigation and trial is on-going.

The best interests of the child and proper support for trafficked victims must be core aspects in the way law enforcement is carried out. This case also raises the larger societal issues in child trafficking including poor parents that have to give up their babies, unwanted pregnancies, the desperation of childless couples, and the difficulties in registering adopted babies. These must be addressed to prevent similar crimes from recurring.
